वेद veda, as, m. (fr. rt. i. vid; cf. Gr. oida fr. id, Lat. video fr. vid, Goth. vait, Lith. veizd), knowing, knowledge; 'the true knowledge, divine knowledge,' N. of certain celebrated works which constitute the basis of the first period of the Hindū religion, (these works were originally three, viz. 1. the Rīg-veda, 2. the Yajur-veda [of which there are, however, two divisions, see taittirīya-saṃhitā, vājasaneyi-saṃhitā], 3. the Sāma-veda; these three works are sometimes called collectively trayī, 'the triple Vidyā' or 'threefold knowledge,' but the Rīg-veda is really the only original work of the three, and much the most ancient, some of its hymns being rather Indo-European than Hindū, and representing the condition of the Āryans before their final settlement in India; subsequently a fourth Veda was added, called the Atharva-veda, which was probably not completely accepted till after Manu, as his law-book often speaks of the three Vedas—calling them trayam brahma sanātānam, 'the triple eternal Veda,' and stating in I. 23, that the Creator drew forth the Rīg-veda from fire, the Yajur-veda from air, and the Sāma-veda from the sun; and in another place, IV. 124, stating that the Rīg has the gods for its deities, the Yajur has men, and the Sāma has the Pitṛis, on which account the sound of this latter is impure—but only once [XI. 33] mentions the revelation made to Atharvan and Angiras, without, however, calling it by the later name of Atharva-veda, the songs and incantations of the Atharvans not being at that time recognised as a fourth Veda; each of the four Vedas has two distinct parts, viz. 1. a Samhitā or collection of Mantras, i. e. of words of prayer and adoration often addressed either to fire or to some form of the sun or to some form of the air, sky, wind, &c., and praying for health, wealth, long life, cattle, offspring, victory, and even forgiveness of sins, which words of prayer or praise form what is usually called the Mantra portion of the Veda [see mantra], and 2. a Brāhmaṇa portion consisting of Vidhi and Artha-vāda, i. e. directions for the detail of the ceremonies at which the Mantras were to be used and explanations of the legends &c. connected with the Mantras [see brāhmaṇa, vidhī], both these portions being termed Śrutī, revelation orally communicated by the Deity, and heard but not composed or written down by men; although both portions are supposed by orthodox Hindūs to have existed from eternity, and not to require pramāṇa, 'proof,' as they are themselves Pramāṇa, yet the oldest of the Mantras are not likely to belong to a much earlier date than the twelfth or thirteenth century B. C.; and it is certain that both Mantras and Brāhmaṇas were compositions spread over a considerable period, much of the latter being comparatively modern: as the Vedas are properly three, so the Mantras are properly of three forms, 1. Rīc, which are verses of praise in metre, and intended for loud recitation; 2. Yajus, which are in prose, and intended for use at sacrifices; 3. Sāman, which are in metre, and intended for chanting at the Soma or Moon-plant ceremonies, the Mantras of the Atharva-veda having no special name; but it must be borne in mind that the Yajur and Sāma-veda hymns, especially the latter, besides their own Mantras, borrow largely from the Rīg-veda; the Yajur-veda and Sāma-veda being in fact not so much collections of prayers and hymns as special prayer and hymn-books intended as liturgical or sacrificial manuals for the Adhvaryu and Udgātṛi priests respectively, the necessity for which grew out of the vast and complicated ritual elaborated by the Āryans after they had settled down in India [see yajur-veda, sāma-veda]; the more modern Atharva-veda-saṃhitā, on the other hand, is, like the R̥g-veda, a real collection of original hymns mixed up with incantations, borrowing little from the R̥g, having no direct relation to mere ritual or sacrifices, but supposed by mere recitation to produce long life, to cure diseases [generally in connection with the use of some plant or drug gifted with magical properties], to obtain success in love or gaming, to effect the ruin of enemies, and to secure the reciter's own prosperity; each of the four Vedas seems to have passed through numerous Śākhās or schools, giving rise to various recensions of the text, though the R̥g-veda is only preserved in the Śākala recension; as to arrangement, the Mantras being made up in the first instance of separate Padas or words are joined together so as to form Sūktas or hymns; the hymns of the Yajur-veda, with the exception of its last book, which is thought to be mystical, are arranged according to the sacrifices at which its Mantras were used, and those of the Sāma-veda with reference especially to the Moon-plant sacrifices, but those of the R̥g-veda Mantras having no direct reference to sacrificial acts are arranged either according to their authors and the objects addressed or according to mere bulk; the former is the distribution into ten Maṇḍalas, the first and last three Maṇḍalas including a variety of authors or rather R̥ishis [who are said to have seen the Vedas and not composed them], and each of the other Maṇḍalas belonging to one particular R̥ishi; the latter is the distribution into Aṣṭakas [see maṇḍala, varga]: a tradition makes Vyāsa the compiler and arranger of the Vedas in their present form: they each have an Anukramapī or Index, giving the first word of every hymn, the number of verses, the name of the devatā or deified being about which the Mantra is concerned [sometimes, however, the devatā may be an inanimate object], the names and families of the authors and the metre, the principal work of this kind being the Sarvānukramapī or general Index; out of the Brāhmaṇa portion of the Veda grew two other departments of Vedic literature, sometimes included under the general name Veda, viz. the strings of aphoristic rules, called Sūtras [though these are often said to be pauruṣeya, i. e. human compositions], and the mystical treatises on the nature of God and the relation of soul and matter, called Upanishads, which were appended to the Āraṇyakas, certain chapters of the Brāhmaṇas so obscure and awe-inspiring in their allusions to the Supreme Spirit of the Universe that they had to be read in the solitude of forests; the most important of the former are the Kalpa-sūtras or Śrauta-sūtras as founded directly on Śruti; these strings of rules being in fact guides to the rambling discursive Brāhmaṇas and systematized directories for the due performance of every part of the ceremonial, while the Upanishads, on the other hand, taught the secret doctrine [called rahasya in Manu II. 165, and vedānta in VI. 83, 94] underlying the ceremonial, viz. the existence of one Universal Spirit, called Brahma, with which the whole creation and the human soul itself was identified; as the Śrauta-sūtras were followed by the Gṛihya and Sāmāyācārika Sūtras or 'rules for domestic ceremonies and conventional customs,' which again became the forerunners of the Dharma-śāstras and thus linked the Veda with the code of Manu, so the Āraṇyakas were followed by the Upanishads, which latter became the real Veda of thinking Hindūs, leading to the Darśanas or systems of philosophy, and linking them also with Vedic literature: in modern writings the name of 'fifth Veda' is accorded to the Itihāsas or legendary epic poems and the Purāṇas, and certain Upa-vedas or secondary Vedas are enumerated, that of the R̥g-veda being the Āyur-veda or Veda on medicine, that of the Yajur being the Dhanur-veda or Veda on archery, that of the Sāma being the Gāndharva-veda or Veda on music, and that of the Atharva-veda being either the Śhāpatya-veda or Artha-śāstra or Silpa-śāstra, q. q. v. v.; the Vedāṅgas or works serving as limbs [for preserving the integrity] of the Veda, of which the Kalpa-sūtras form a part, are explained under vedāṅga, col. 3: the only other works included under the head of Veda being the Pāṇisishṭas, which supply rules for the ritual omitted in other works; in the Bṛihad-āraṇyaka Upanishad the Vedas and all the above literature are represented as the breathings of Brahmā, while in some of the Purāṇas the four Vedas are said to have been created by the four-faced Brahmā from his several mouths, and in the Viṣṇu-Purāṇa the Veda and Viṣṇu are identified; reading the Veda, (Sāy. = vedādhya-yana, R̥g-veda VIII. 19, 5); comment, explanation; metre; epithet of Viṣṇu; obtaining, acquisition, wealth, = dhana (Ved.); a bunch or bundle of Kuśa grass (= kuśa-muṣṭī, Manu IV. 36; in this sense probably connected with vedā, 'an altar made of grass') (ās), m. pl. the Vedas, i. e. the three principal Vedas; (ā), f., N. of a river. — Veda-kusala, as, ā, am, versed in or conversant with the Vedas. — Veda-kauḷeyaka, as, m. addressed in the Mantras; after which come twelve chapters of explanation with an introduction, to which is also added a Parīṣiṣṭa of two other chapters; [see yāska]: 5. Jyotiṣa, 'astronomy,' or rather the Vedic calendar, represented by a small tract in a more modern style than the Sūtra works, the object of which is to fix the most auspicious days for sacrifices: 6. Kalpa, 'ceremonial,' represented by a large number of Sūtra works intended to systematize the tedious and confused ritualistic precepts of the Brāhmaṇas; each of the Vedas has its own Kalpa or Srauta Sūtras, [see sūtra and cf. veda, p. 963]: the first and second of these Vedāṅgas is said to be intended to secure the correct reading or recitation of the Veda, the third and fourth the understanding of it, and the fifth and sixth its proper employment at sacrifices: the Vedāṅgas are alluded to by Manu, who calls them, in III. 184, Pravācānas, 'expositions,' a term which is said to be also applied to the Brāhmaṇas.) — Vedāṅgin, ī, m. one who studies or teaches the Vedāṅgas. — Vedāḍi ('da-āḍi'), n. or vedāḍi-varṇa ('da-āḍ'), as, m. or vedāḍi-vija ('da-āḍ'), am, n. the first syllable of the Veda or the mystical name of God, the sacred syllable Om. — Vedādhyagana ('da-adh'), as, m. the going over or study of the Vedas. — Vedādhipa ('da-adh'), as, or vedādhipati ('da-adh'), īs, m. 'end of the Veda,' N. of the second and most important part of the Mīmāṃsā or third of the three great divisions of Hindū philosophy (so called either as teaching the ultimate aim and scope of the Veda or simply as founded on the Upanishads which come at the end of the Veda; this system, although belonging to the Mīmāṃsā school [see mīmāṃsā] and sometimes called Uttara-mīmāṃsā, 'examination of the later portion or jñāna-kāṇḍa of the Veda,' i. e. of that portion contained in the Āraṇyakas and Upanishads [which teach the knowledge of Brahma or the Universal Spirit], stands out prominently by itself as representing the popular pantheistic creed of the Hindūs of the present day, which is really based on the Upanishads and constitutes the true Veda of the modern cultivated Brāhmaṇ, underlying also all the polytheism and multiform mythology of the people; it explains the universe synthetically as a development from one principle, and so differs from the analytical Nyāya which treats of the various objects constituting the material world as it finds them, without investigating their mutual relation of effect and cause, and from the Sāṅkhya which, although also synthetic, propounds a duality of principles to account for the visible universe; according to the Vedānta doctrine, Brahma [nom. neut. of brahman] or the Supreme Soul, also called Paramātman, is both the efficient and material cause of the world; the Ātman or individual human soul, as well as all the phenomena of nature, being really identical with the Paramātman, and their existence being only the result of Ajñāna or an assumed ignorance on the part of this Supreme Soul, who is described as both Creator and Creation, Actor and Act, Existence, Knowledge, Joy, and as devoid of the three qualities, [see guṇa]; the liberation of the human soul, its deliverance from transmigrations, and re-union with the Paramātman, with which it is really identified, is only to be effected by a removal of that ignorance which prevents the consciousness of this identity and by a proper understanding of the truth of the Vedānta; this system is also sometimes called Brahma-mīmāṃsā and Sāṅkhya-mīmāṃsā, 'investigation of the embodied soul,' the founder of the school is said to have been Vyāsa, also called Bādarāyaṇa, and its most eminent teacher was Saṅkarācārya; (āś), m. pl. the Upanishads (see Kullūka on Manu VI. 83), works on the Vedānta philosophy. — Vedānta-kalpataru, us, m., N. of a work by Amalananda Vyāsaśrama. — Vedānta-kalpalatikā, f., N. of a work by Madhusūdana-sarasvatī. — Vedānta-ga or vedānta-jña, as, m. a follower or knower of the Vedānta. — Vedānta-pradīpa, as, m., N. of a commentary by Rāmānuja on the Bādarāyaṇa-sūtra. — Vedānta-bhāṣya, am, n., N. of a work by Vyāsa-tīrtha. — Vedānta-sāra, as, m. I. 153. fr. rt. i, śi; more probably to be connected with rt. śvi and śavas, see śivī), auspicious, propitious, prosperous, happy, fortunate, lucky, increasing, thriving, right; (as), m. N. of the third god of the Hindī Tri-mūrti. In the later mythology regarded as 'the destroyer, and with Brahmā, 'the creator,' and Viṣṇu, 'the preserver,' constituting the well known Hindī triad of divine manifestations; although the name Śiva is not found applied to any god in the Veda, the worship of the destroying and reproducing principle under this name was rapidly developed in the Purāṇas and epic poems, and became very general in later times, the worshippers of Śiva or Śaivas assigning to him the first place in the triad and by identifying him with the principles of creation and reproduction as well as that of destruction, constituting him the one Supreme Being who is supposed to comprehend all the powers and forces of nature and whose formidable character makes him the first object of propitiation and adoration; in the Śiva-Purāṇa he is addressed as Brahmā, Viṣṇu, Indra, Varuṇa, the Sun, Moon, Earth, Fire, Water, Air, Ether, &c., while even in the Viṣṇu and other Purāṇas not specially devoted to his praise, he is mentioned with the greatest reverence and awe; according to one view the name Śiva belonged originally to the principal god of the aboriginal tribes of India, and being subsequently adopted together with the Linga or symbol of reproduction into the Pantheon of the Āryans, was then identified with their own deity Rudra, who occupies a conspicuous position in the Veda as god of storms; but according to a more likely supposition the adjective śiva, 'auspicious,' being at first only used as an euphemistic epithet to propitiate the lord of tempests, passed afterwards into his name, and was ultimately adopted as the principal name of the god of destruction, [see rudra]; according to Viṣṇu-Purāṇa I. 8. there are eight principal manifestations of Śiva, viz. Rudra, Bhava, Śarva, Iśāna, Paśu-pati, Bhīma, Ugra, Mahā-deva, which again are visibly represented under eight Tanus or material forms, viz. the Sun, Water, Earth, Air, Fire, Ether, the officiating Brahman, and the Moon, Śiva being supposed to uphold the universe by means of these forms; as presiding over reproduction, which follows destruction, his symbol is the Linga or Phallus, under which form he is generally worshipped at the present day; as god of justice or punishment, which character he shares with the gods Yama and Varuṇa, he is represented as riding on a white bull, the god Dharma, it is said, having taken this form and requested Śiva to accept him as his vehicle; his own colour is sometimes depicted as black in his character of destroyer of the world, when he is called Kāla or Time; again, one of his representations is as Ardha-nārī, 'half-female,' the other half being male to symbolize the unity of the generative principle, his name being then Ardha-nārīśa, 'the half-female lord,' he has sometimes five faces, whence his name Pañcānana; he has also three eyes, one of which is in his forehead, and which are thought to denote his view of the three divisions of time, past, present, and future, while a moon's crescent, round or above the central eye, marks the measure of time by months, a serpent round his neck the measure of time by years, and a second necklace of skulls with numerous other serpents about his person, the perpetual revolution of ages, and the successive extinction and generation of the races of mankind; his hair is thickly matted together, and gathered above his forehead into a coil, so as to project like a horn; on the top of it he bears the Ganges, the rush of which river in its descent from heaven he intercepted by his head that the earth might not be crushed by the weight of the falling stream; his throat is dark-blue from the stain of the deadly poison which would have destroyed the world had it not been swallowed by him on its production at the churning of the ocean by the gods for the nectar of immortality; he is sometimes represented clothed in a deer-skin, sometimes in a tiger-skin, or he appears sitting on a tiger-skin or holding a deer in one of his hands; in explanation of this a legend is told that Śiva, having once visited a forest in the form of a religious mendicant, the wives of the Rishis residing there fell in love with his great beauty, which the Rishis perceiving resented; in order, therefore, to overpower him, they first dug a pit, and by magical arts caused a tiger to rush out of it, which he slew, and taking its skin wore it as a garment; they next caused a deer to spring out upon him, which he took up in his left hand and ever afterwards retained there; they then produced a red-hot iron, but this too he took up and kept in his hand as a weapon: sometimes, again, he appears wearing an elephant's skin which belonged to an Asura named Gaya, who acquired such power that he conquered the gods and would have destroyed the Munis had they not fled to Benares and taken refuge in a temple of Śiva, who then destroyed the Asura and, ripping up his body, stripped off the hide which he afterwards cast over his shoulders for a cloak: Śiva holds a triśūla or three-pronged trident [also called Pināka] in his hand to denote, as some think, his combination of the three attributes of Creator, Destroyer, and Regenerator; his other weapons are a bow called Ajakava or Ajagava, a thunderbolt, an axe, a kind of staff with transverse pieces surmounted by a skull called Khatvāṅga, and another nondescript weapon called Khinkira; he also carries a kind of rattle or drum, shaped like an hour-glass, called Damaru, and a Pāśa or noose for binding incorrigible offenders; his attendants or servants are called Pramathas; they are sometimes regarded as demons or supernatural beings of various kinds, and form a complete host; some of his more personal attendants or chamberlains have special names, such as Nandi or Nandin, Bhṛṅging, Tanḍu, the latter being the original teacher of dancing &c., whence Śiva is called Naṭeśvara, 'the lord of dancers,' and is himself described as nāṭya-priya, fond of dancing; his principal wife Durgā, otherwise called Pārvatī, Umā, Gaurī, Bhavānī, Satī, &c., is the chief object of worship with the Śāktas and Tantrikas, see śakti, śākta, tantra: his sons are Gaṇeśa and Kārtikeya; he destroyed several Asuras or demons, such as Pura, Tripura, Andhaka, Ruru; he also scorched the god of love, Kāma-deva, to ashes by a glance from his central eye, that deity having attempted to inflame him with passion for Pārvatī whilst he was engaged in severe penance; he is said to have cut off one of the heads of the god Brahmā, that god having originally possessed five heads, one of which is fabled to have addressed Śiva on a particular occasion in a disrespectful manner, cf. brahma-mūrdha-bhrāt; he also decapitated Dakṣa and replaced his head by that of a ram, because that sage, who was his father-in-law, omitted to invite him and his wife Satī to a great sacrifice at which all the other gods were present, see dakṣahādvara-dhvaṅsa-kṛt; in the exercise of his function of Universal Destroyer he destroys, at the end of every Kalpa, not only all created beings, but even Brahmā, Viṣṇu, and the other gods, whose bones and skulls he wears as garlands; moreover, at the end of one of the early Kalpas he is fabled to have burnt them up by a flash from his central eye, and afterwards to have rubbed their ashes upon his body, whence the use of ashes is considered of great importance in his worship, while the use of the Rudrākṣa berries or beads originated, it is said, from the legend that Śiva, on his way to destroy the three cities, called Tri-pura, let fall some tears of rage which became converted into these beads: his residence is Kailāsa, one of the loftiest northern peaks of the Himālaya, which is also the paradise of Kuvera: he has strictly no incarnations like those of Viṣṇu, though Virābhadrā and the eight Bhairavas are sometimes regarded as forms of him, sometimes as his sons, see virābhadrā, bhairava; he is especially worshipped at Benares and has even more names than Viṣṇu, one thousand and eight being specified in the sixty-ninth chapter of the Śiva-Purāṇa and in the seventeenth chapter of the Anuśāsana-parvan of the Mahā-bhārata, some of the most common being Mahā-deva, Sambhu, Sankara, Iśa, Īśvara, Maheśvara, Hara, Rudra; the phallic emblem of Śiva, the male genital organ, penis; a god (=deva, according to Śabda-k.); an auspicious planetary conjunction; the twentieth of the astronomical periods called Yogas, (see yoga); epithet of a particular month; the Veda; final emancipation (=mokṣa); a pillar or post to which cattle are tied; a kind of drug and perfume (=bāluka or vāluka); a particular plant or drug (=pundarika); the black Dhustūra or thorn-apple; bdelium; quicksilver; N. of a scribe; (au), m. du. Su-prabhā, Kāncanākshī, Viśālā, Manoramā, Ogha-vatī, Su-ṛenu, and Vimalodakā; in the Sānti-parvan 12920, Sarasvatī is called the mother of the Vedas, which is also elsewhere said of Vāc, though Vāc in the earlier mythology is regarded as a separate deity; according to later legends the goddess Sarasvatī was persuaded to descend from heaven and confer her invention of language and letters on the human race by the sage Bharata, whence one of her names is Bhārati; she is sometimes represented as assuming the form of a Haṅsa or swan, and is also called Mahā-śvetā or Mahā-śuklā from her extreme whiteness; N. of a celebrated river (held very sacred by the Hindus and in the earlier mythology mixed up with the goddess [see above]); it corresponds with the modern Sursooty, which rises in the mountains bounding the north-east part of the province of Delhi, and running in a south-westerly direction becomes lost in the sands of the great desert; this river formerly marked one of the boundaries of the region called Ārya-deśa, and of a particularly sacred district called in Manu II. 17. साङ्ख्य sāṅkhyā, as, ā, am (fr. san-khyā), relating to number or calculation, reckoning up, calculating, enumerating, deliberating, reasoning; rational, discriminative; (as, am), m. n., N. of one of the three great divisions of Hindū philosophy, (ascribed to the sage Kapila, q. v., and so called as 'reckoning up' or 'enumerating' twenty-five Tattvas or true principles, its object being to effect the final liberation of the twenty-fifth Tattva [Puruṣa, the Soul] from the fetters of the phenomenal creation by conveying the correct knowledge of the twenty-four other Tattvas, and rightly discriminating the Soul from them; these twenty-four principles are divided into eight Prakṛitis or Producers and sixteen Vikāras or Productions; the eight Producers start from a Mūla-prakṛiti or original Producer [variously called Pradhāna, 'chief one,' A-ryakta, 'unevolved,' Brahman, 'supreme,' Māyā, 'power of illusion,' Bahu-dhānaka, 'much-containing'], which is emphatically the Prakṛiti, 'First-producer,' or 'Originant,' being a kind of primordial germ whence all the twenty-three remaining Tattvas are evolved; its first production is the 2nd Tattva, viz. Buddhi, Intellect [sometimes called Mahat from its being the great source of the two other internal organs or instruments, Ahankāra and Manas, which are both modifications of it]; 3rd in order comes Ahankāra, 'the I-making' principle or sense of individuality; 4th come the five Tan-mātras or subtle elementary particles out of which the five grosser elements are evolved; the preceding eight principles constitute the Producers, [all but the first being of course in one sense also Productions]; then follow, as proceeding from the Tan-mātras, the five Sthūla-bhūtas or grosser elements [also called Mahā-bhūta], viz. a. ākāśa, space or ether, having the Guṇa or property of sound [śabda], which is the Vishaya or object of apprehension for the corresponding Indriya or organ, the Ear; b. vāyu, air, having the Guṇa or property of tangibility or touch [sparsa], which is the Vishaya for the Skin; c. tejas or jyotiḥ, fire or light, having the property of form or colour [rūpa], which is the Vishaya for the Eye; d. āpas, water, having the property of savour or taste [rasa], which is the Vishaya for the Tongue; e. prithivī or bhūmī, earth, having the property of odour or smell [gandha], which is the Vishaya for the Nose, [see guṇa]; each of these elements after the first having also the Guṇa or Guṇas of the preceding besides its own, and these Guṇas being sometimes identified with the Tan-mātras; then follow the eleven organs, produced like the Tan-mātras from the 3rd Tattva Ahankāra, forming with them a class of sixteen [śoḍaśakāḥ]; these eleven organs are the five above-named Buddhindriyāni or organs of sense, viz. ear, skin, eye, tongue, nose; the five Karmendriyāni or organs of action, viz. larynx, hand, foot, arms, and organ of generation; and an eleventh organ called Manas, commonly translated 'mind,' which stands between both sets of Indriyas as an internal organ of perception and action, or of cognition and volition, [see manas]; the twenty-fifth Tattva, Puruṣa or Soul, is to be wholly distinguished from the twenty-four just enumerated; it is neither a Producer nor Production; it is altogether passive, and simply a looker-on, having nothing whatever to do with the acts of creation, which it only contemplates, uniting itself with unintelligent Prakṛiti, as a lame man mounted on a blind man's shoulders, for the sake of observing and enjoying the acts of this Prakṛiti, who herself cannot see or observe anything; without that union no creation can take place any more than can the birth of a child without the union of male and female; this view of creation implies the eternal existence of innumerable separate individual souls, each soul by its junction with Prakṛiti causing the creation of its own phenomenal world, which world, however, has an existence of its own independent of all connection with the particular Puruṣa to which it is joined; moreover, each soul is invested in the first place with a subtle body [līṅga-śarīra or sūkṣma-śarīra] composed of Buddhi, Ahankāra, the five Tan-mātras, and the eleven organs, and afterwards with a grosser body formed of the five elements; the former accompanying the soul through all its transmigrations, while the latter perishes; this system also teaches that Prakṛiti and its products may be regarded as made up of three ingredients in a state of equipoise, viz. Sattva, Rajas, and Tamas, Goodness, Passion, and Darkness, commonly called Guṇas, but rather substances than qualities, and more correctly translated 'fettors,' because they are like a triple-stranded rope [see guṇa] which binds and confines the soul: the Sāṅkhyā system agrees with the Vedānta in being syncretical, and so differing from the Analytical Nyāya; its great point of divergence from the Vedānta is in maintaining two principles which the Vedānta denies, [see vedānta]; it is said to be atheistical as ignoring all notice of a Supreme Soul, whose existence is, however, established by the Yoga branch of the Sāṅkhyā proper, [see yoga]: the vague outlines of the system before its crystallization into a distinct school of dualism are propounded in the first Book of Manu; its more fully developed doctrines are contained in the Sāṅkhyā-sūtras ascribed to Kapila, in the Tattva-samāsa, or Summary of Principles, ascribed to the same author, in the Sāṅkhyā-kārikā [see below], and the numerous commentaries on these works, some of which are enumerated below: the Buddhist system and that of bishop Berkeley in Europe have many points of connection with the Sāṅkhyā, but the modern philosophers of India pay far more attention to the Nyāya and Vedānta; a follower of the Sāṅkhyā system of philosophy; a patronymic of the Vedic Rishi Atri; epithet of Śiva. — Sāṅkhyā-kārikā, f., N. of a collection of memorial verses or stanzas by Īśvara-kṛishṇa in which a summary of the Sāṅkhyā system is given. — Sāṅkhyā-kārikā-bhāṣya, am, n., N. of a commentary by Gauḍa-pāda on the Sāṅkhyā-kārikā. — Sāṅkhyā-kaumudī, f. = sāṅkhyā-tattva-kaumudī; N. of another commentary by Rāma-kṛishṇa-bhāṭṭācārya on the Sāṅkhyā-kārikā. — Sāṅkhyā-krama-dīpikā, f., N. of a commentary on the Tattva-samāsa. — Sāṅkhyā-śāndrikā, f., N. of a commentary on the Sāṅkhyā-kārikā by Nārāyaṇa-tīrtha. — Sāṅkhyā-tattva-kaumudī, f., N. of a commentary on the Sāṅkhyā-kārikā by Vācaspati-miśra. — Sāṅkhyā-tattva-pradīpa, as, m., N. of a brief exposition of the Sāṅkhyā system by Kavi-rāja-yati. — Sāṅkhyā-tattva-vilāsa, as, m., N. of a commentary by Raghunātha-tarkavāgīśa-bhāṭṭācārya on the Sāṅkhyā-tattva-kaumudī. — Sāṅkhyā-pravācāna, am, n. [3. sv]*, yet there is a clear connection between this Veda and the Soma ritual or moon-plant ceremonies; the principal part of its Mantras being specially arranged for chanting by the Udgātrī priests at such ceremonies, [e.g. the Jyotiṣṭoma and its various stages of Agnīṣṭoma, Ukthyā, &c.]; nevertheless it is really a mere reproduction of parts of the Rig-veda transposed and scattered about piecemeal, only 78 verses in the whole Sāma-veda being, it is said, untraceable to the present recension of the Ṛik: the Sāman of the Sāma-veda consists of two parts; the first, called Ārcika [or Pūrvārcika or Chando-grantha], contains 585 verses disjoined from their proper sequence in the Rig-veda and arranged in 59 Dāsatis or decades, which again are subdivided into Prapāthakas and Ardha-prapāthakas; the second, called Staubhika [or Uttarārcika or Uttarā-grantha], contains 1225 verses, also chiefly from the Ṛik-sāman, but less disjoined than in the first part, and arranged in nine Prapāthakas with Ardha-prapāthakas, mostly, however, grouped in triplets, the first verse of which is also in the

Ārcika, and thus appears twice in the Sāman; this verse is called the Yoni or womb, being, as it were, a kind of parent of the two following verses, called Uttarā, which are required to adapt themselves to all the modulations and modifications observed in the intoning of this leading verse; directions for these modulations being carefully laid down in the Gānas or manuals for chanting, two of which, viz. the Veya-gāna and Āraṇya-gāna, are a directory for the Ārcika portion, and two, viz. the Ūha-gāna and Ūhya-gāna, for the Staubhika, the supposed efficacy of the hymns depending greatly on the right application of these directions for their utterance: it has been calculated that out of the aggregate of 1549 distinct verses remaining in the two divisions of the Sāma-veda Sāman after subtracting the repeated verses, 190 are from the 1st Maṇḍala of the Ṛik, 9 from the 2nd, 40 from the 3rd, 23 from the 4th, 53 from the 5th, 77 from the 6th, 75 from the 7th, 355 from the 8th, 9 from the Valakhilyas, 545 from the 9th, 95 from the 10th; there being also 12 verses from the Atharva-veda, and 4 from the Vājasaneyi-sāman or white Yajur-veda; it will be observed that more verses are taken from the ninth than from any other Maṇḍala of the Ṛik, the whole of the 114 hymns of this ninth Maṇḍala being especially devoted to the praise of the Soma plant, and thence called Pāvamānya or 'purificational,' this plant being there not only personified as a deity but described as primeval, immortal, all-pervading, all-powerful, lord of gods, and indeed the Supreme Being himself; it is remarkable that although in Manu I. 23, the Sāma-veda is described as drawn forth from the sun, yet in IV. 123, 124, its sound is said to possess a kind of impurity, which, however, Kullūka explains to be merely a semblance of impurity, the reason given for this defect being that whereas the Rig-veda has the gods for its objects and the Yajur has men, the Sāma has special reference to the Pitris or deceased ancestors [this relationship implying, perhaps, a connection between the Soma plant and the moon, as this plant was collected by moonlight, and in the later mythology was sometimes identified with the moon, the supposed residence of the Pitris]; this Veda is said to possess eight Brāhmaṇas, viz. the Praudha or large Brāhmaṇa [= Pañca-viṣṭa], the Shadviṣṭa, the Sāma-vidhi or Sāma-vidhāna, the Ārshya, the Devatā-dhāya, the Vaṇṣa, the Sāmanitopanishad, and the Upanishad [sic], which last is probably the same as the Chāndogyanishad of the Sāma-veda regarded as a Brāhmaṇa, see Chandoga-brāhmaṇa, brāhmaṇa. — Sāmaveda-śāla, f., N. of a short work (giving certain musical directions in the form of modulations and intonations of letters or syllables for the chanting of the Sāma-veda); the work contains seven chapters, viz. veya-śāla, āraṇa-śāla, ūha-śāla, ūhya-śāla, gāna-śāla, uttarotara-pada-śāla, and stobha-śāla. — Sāmaveda-sāman, f. the Sāman of the Sāma-veda. — Sāmavedārtha-prakāśa ('dā-ar'), as, m., N. of Śāyana's commentary on the Tāndya-Brāhmaṇa. — Sāma-vedin, ī, m. a Brāhman who studies the Sāma-veda. — Sāma-vedīya, as, m. one having to do with the Sāma-veda, a Chandoga priest. — Sāma-sṛavas, ās, m., N. of a pupil of Yājñavalkya. — Sāma-srāddha-tattva, am, n., N. of a part of the Smṛiti-tattva. — Sāma-sāman, f. the collection of texts constituting the Sāma-veda. — Sāma-saṅkhyā, f., N. of a Parīśiṣṭa connected with the Sāma-veda. — Sāma-saṅgāyaka, as, m. a chanter of the Sāma-veda. — Sāma-siddhi, īs, f. the art of accomplishing something in a peaceable way. — Sāma-sūtra, am, n. a Sūtra work belonging to the Sāma-veda, (ten such works are enumerated). — Sāmānga ('ma-an'), am, n. an Anga of the Sāma-veda. — Sāmodbhava ('ma-ud'), as, m. an elephant; [cf. sāma-ja]. — Sāmonmukha ('ma-un'), as, ī, am, eager for conciliation, wishing to conciliate. — Sāmapācāra or sāmapāya ('ma-up'), as, m. a mild remedy, moderate measure, gentle means.

सूत्र sūtr (probably to be regarded as a Nom. fr. sūtra below; see sūtraya, col. 3), cl. 10. P. sūtrayati, sūtrāpayati, &c., to tie, bind, thread, string; to unbind, relax: Intens. sosūtryate.

Sūtra, am, n, (fr. rt. sv, 'to sew,' but said to be connected with rt. sūtr above), a thread, string, line, cord; fibre, wire; a collection of threads; the sacred thread or cord worn by the first three classes, (see yajñopavita, p. 804); the string or wire of a puppet or doll; a short rule or precept, axiom, aphorism (in morals, religion, or science; iti sūtreṇa, according to such an aphorism); a short and technical sentence or metrical line used as a memorial rule to aid in the acquirement of any system (and hence generally expressed in brief and obscure and sometimes symbolical language, intelligible only to those who possess the key to its interpretation, this key being sometimes given in separate Sūtras called Paribhāṣās, and the right understanding of a whole series or chain of rules depending on a knowledge of the Adhikāra or heading-rule and its influence [anuvṛtī] on those that follow; these short sentences and aphoristic rules, the use of which constitutes a most curious feature in the literary history of the Hindūs, appear to have been often mere aids to the memory of teachers—mere hints to guide lecturers in their oral explanations; they were also especially useful in this way to the priests who had the management of a complicated ritual; any work or manual consisting of strings or long lines of the above aphoristic rules and sentences hanging together like threads, (though the term sūtra may possibly indicate not so much a line or series of rules as rules written on leaves which were kept together by strings; these Sūtra works form a sort of groundwork or foundation of teaching, not only in all religious ritual, but in philosophy, in grammar, and in the collateral subjects of accent, euphony, etymology, and prosody: thus in religion and ritual there are first the Srauta-sūtras, and among them principally the Kalpa-sūtras, founded directly on Śruti, q. v., and treating especially of ritual; they form a kind of rubric or directory to Vedic ceremonial, or in other words, a complete systematized guide to the rambling discursive Brahmaṇa as distinct from the Mantra portion of the Veda [see brahmaṇa], giving concise rules for the performance of every kind of sacrifice; there are Sūtras of this kind by Āśvalāyana and Sāṅkhyāna for the Rig-veda; by Kātyāyana for the White Yajur-veda; by Āpastamba, Baudhāyana, and the Mānavas for the Black Yajur-veda; by Lātyāyana, Drahyāyana, Maśaka, and Gobhila for the Sāma-veda; and by Kuśika for the Atharva-veda; there are also two other kinds of Sūtras connected with ceremonial, viz. the Grihya-sūtras and Sāmāyācārika or Dharma-sūtras [often by the same authors, with special reference also to each separate Veda, and even placed by some, like the Kalpa, under the head of Sūtras founded on Śruti], which are really 'rules for domestic ceremonies and conventional customs,' and are sometimes called collectively Smārta-sūtras [as founded on smṛiti or 'tradition,' see smārta]; these led to the later Dharma-śāstras or 'law-books' attributed to Manu, Yājñavalkya, Parāśara, &c., the names of the authors of the Sūtras and of the law-books being often identical; in philosophy each system has its regular text-book of aphorisms written in Sūtras by its supposed founder, see vedānta-sūtra, nyāya-s, sāṅkhya-s, mīmāṃsā-s, vaiśeṣika-s, yoga-s; in Vyākaraṇa or grammar there are the celebrated Sūtras of Pāṇini in eight books, which are the groundwork of a vast grammatical literature, besides the Uṇādi-sūtras on certain affixes; in Vedic accent and phonetics there are the Prātiśākhya [see prātiśākhya] and the Phit-sūtras of Sāntānava; in etymology there are strings of Vedic words, and in prosody there are the Sūtras of Pingala-nāga on Chandas, including both Vedic and non-Vedic metres, and the Nidāna-sūtra on the metres of the Sāma-veda and Vedic metres generally: it should be borne in mind that the mixture of Slokas in some of the *Prātiśākhya*s and in some more recent Sūtra works, though depriving them of the brevity strictly necessary to constitute Sūtras, does not prevent their being regarded as collections of aphoristic and memorial rules: with regard to grammatical Sūtras it is necessary to remember that all connecting words used as prepositions, however necessary to the sense, are omitted; thus, a word in the genitive case requires sthāne, 'instead of,' to be supplied; a word in the ablative requires param, 'after'; a word in the instrumental requires saha, 'together with'; a word in the locative, though sometimes to be translated in the ordinary way by prefixing 'in,' may often be used as a locative absolute, and pare must then be supplied, the sense being 'on such an affix or word coming after or following'; the word vā is equivalent to 'optionally' or 'alternative'; any rule, law, canon, decree (in law &c.).—Sūtra-kaṇṭha, as, m, 'having Sūtras in the throat or mouth ready to be repeated,' a Brāhman; 'having lines on the throat,' a pigeon, dove; a wagtail.—Sūtra-karman, a, n, 'rule-work,' carpentry.—Sūtra-kāra, as, m, the author or composer of Sūtras.—Sūtra-kṛt, t, m, 'Sūtra-maker,' the author of an aphorism or set of aphorisms.—Sūtra-koṇa or sūtra-koṇaka, as, m, a small drum shaped like an hour-glass and struck by a string and button (= ḍamaru).—Sūtra-gaṇḍikā, f, a kind of stick used by weavers in spinning threads.—Sūtra-graha, as, ā, am, holding a thread.—Sūtra-grāha, as, ī, am, taking a thread.—Sūtra-daraṇa, N, of a class of Caraṇas or Vedic schools who introduced various Sūtra works.—Sūtra-lantu, us, m, a thread, string, line.—Sūtra-tarkuṣi, f, a distaff, spindle.—Sūtra-dhara, as, m, = sūtra-dhāra.—Sūtra-dhāra, as, m, 'rule-holder, thread-holder,' a stage-manager, a director or principal actor who arranges the plot of a drama and takes a leading part in the prelude; a carpenter; the author of a set of rules or aphorisms; epithet of Indra.—Sūtra-piṭaka, as, m, N, of one of the three collections of Buddhist writings (viz. those which prescribe rules for the laity, see tri-piṭaka).—Sūtra-pushpa, as, m, 'thread-flowered,' the cotton plant.—Sūtra-bhid, t, m, 'thread-cutter,' a tailor.—Sūtra-bhṛit, t, m, = sūtra-dhāra.—Sūtra-madhya-bhū, is, f, 'born amid threads or fibres,' the resin of Shorea Robusta; incense.—Sūtra-yantra, am, n, 'thread-machine,' a shuttle; a weaver's loom.—Sūtra-vid, t, m, 'a Sūtra-knower,' one versed in Sūtras.—Sūtra-viṇā, f, a kind of lute (= lāvikā).—Sūtra-veshṭana, am, n, a weaver's shuttle; the act of weaving.—Sūtrātman ('ra-āt'), ā, ā, ā, having the nature of a string or thread; (ā), m, 'soul-thread,' intellect having for its site the collective totality of subtle bodies; the soul.—Sūtrālī ('ra-ālī'), f, a string of beads &c. worn round the neck, necklace.

I. 50, I. 115, IV. 13, VII. 60, X. 37, X. 170; sometimes he is called son of Dyaus, sometimes of Aditi; in one passage Ushas, the Dawn, is his wife, in another he is styled the child of the Dawns; he moves through the sky in a chariot drawn by seven ruddy horses or mares [see saptāśva, harit, harid-āśva, sundhyu]; he is described as the eye of Mitra and Varuṇa, and sometimes of Agni; he is all-seeing, ever beholding the good and bad deeds of mortals, the preserver of all things stationary and moving; in other passages he is represented as holding a somewhat secondary position, being made to shine or have his path prepared for him by Mitra and Varuṇa, by Aryaman, by Indra, by the Dawns, and others; the long hymn, Atharva-veda XIII. 2, is entirely in his praise; there is another addressed to the Sun, called Bhānu, in Mahā-bhārata, Vana-parvan 166, &c.; and in the Yuddha-kāṇḍa of the Rāmāyana [VI. 106, Bombay edit.], Rāma, when about to do battle with Rāvaṇa, is told by Agastya to repeat a hymn, called Āditya-hṛidayā, to the Sun, there called Vivasvat, and identified with Āditya, Savitṛi, Sūrya, Pūshan, and in fact with Brahmā, Viṣṇu, Siva, and all the other gods; in the later mythology the seven-horsed chariot of Sūrya is said to be driven by Arupa or the Dawn as its charioteer, who is represented without legs; the Sun, whether named Sūrya or Vivasvat, has several wives, see sūryā below, and cf. sa-varṇā, see also Chāyā, sa-jñā, āsvini; by Sanjñā he had two children, Yama and Yamunā, q. v. v.; by Āsvini, the two Āsvins; by Kuntī, before her marriage with Pāṇḍu, he had Karṇa, q. v.; and he is also supposed to be the father of Manu Vaivasvata, and to be the progenitor of one of the two great lines of Hindū kings [see sūrya-vaṇṣa below]; seven Sūryas are sometimes mentioned, which are probably the seven planets, the Sun being regarded as a planet by Hindū astronomers; ninety-four synonyms of Sūrya are commonly given, and his epithets are almost innumerable; at the end of a Kalpa he is called Kāla-sūrya; a symbolical expression for the number twelve (in allusion to the sun in the twelve signs of the zodiac); the swallow-wort (either Calotropis or Asclepias Gigantea, = arka); N. of the son of Bali; of a Dānava; of an astro-nomer (= sūrya-dāsa); epithet of Siva; (ā), f, the wife of Sūrya or the Sun, (also called Sanjñā, q. v.); the daughter of Sūrya or the Sun, (see Rig-veda I. 116, 17; also described as daughter of Savitṛi and wife of the Āsvins, and in other places as married to Soma; in Rig-veda I. 119, 2. she is called Uṛjānt, and in VI. 55, 4, VI. 58, 4. the sister of Pūshan, q. v., who is described as loving her, and receiving her as a gift from the gods; according to some she represents a weak manifestation of the Sun; Sūryā Savitṛi is regarded as the authoress of the Sūrya-sūkta, Rig-veda X. 85; in Naigh. I. 11. Sūryā is enumerated among the vān-nāmāns; the hymn about the marriage of Sūryā (= sūryā-sūkta, q. v.); a new bride; a drug; the colocynth or bitter gourd; [cf. udātta, q. q. v. v. ; the Ud-ātta sound of a vowel is said to result from the employing the upper half of the organs of utterance, and the An-udātta from employing the lower half, while the Svarita represents a sustained mixed intonation neither high nor low, which is well illustrated by the expression tiryag-gamana, i. e. a horizontal or wavy movement of the hand as distinguished from a direct upward and downward motion; Pāṇini, however, applies the term an-udātta, 'non-elevated,' to the neutral accentless tone, and uses the term sanna-tara or an-udātta-tara for 'the very or proper An-udātta,' i. e. the true grave accent which precedes the Udātta; in I. 2, 31. he calls the Svarita am-āhāra, i. e. 'a combination' of the elevated and non-elevated tones; the Svarita accent is denoted in the R̥g-veda by a small upright stroke above the syllable, the Anudātta-tara by a horizontal mark underneath, and the Udātta is left unmarked; but the Svarita mark may denote either a dependent or an independent Svarita, i. e. one produced by an Udātta immediately preceding or a real Svarita belonging to the word itself, and commonly produced by the suppression of an Udātta syllable; again, as a word is supposed to have only one real accent, so words which have real Svaritas of their own do not have Udātta accents; they are called adi-svarita, madhya-svarita, anta-svarita, according as they have Svaritas on the first, middle, or last syllable; it must also be borne in mind that when a dependent Svarita is immediately followed by an Udātta, the Svarita becomes a kind of Anudātta-tara, and is so marked, see tāhābhāvyā; there were, doubtless, different kinds of Svarita pronunciation.) — Svarita-tva, am, n. the state of having the Svarita accent. — Svaritopadha ('ta-up'), as, ā, am, preceded by the Svarita; having the penultimate marked with the Svarita.
